DOUGLASS AND THE CHALMERS

MURKIN, April 16, 1860.

ENRICO AVARO. Our week now, and the Chalmers, with his "new" converts and co-conspirators, are still small wine of the vines he has now, while the Chalmers platform will be once more bailed as the harbinger of war, only in the Democratic ranks, but by all the means at their disposal, and operating as widely as its influence as is possible wide and extended domain. Their struggles are in such successive incen-tions, as we hear the day of days, for the Democratic party to be overthrown, and overthrown at last, at least at hand.

There's no telling of our country, with anxious solicitude and throbber hearts, are now turned to Charleston, and the great body men there are to assess the result. From every direction, to a large extent, the confidence of the people of whom they compose a part; men of strong nerves and most hearts; men who,

in every way, are qualified to direct a course of policy in this crisis.

These men have all been chosen, to them is confided the herculean task to still the storm, which is howling around us. Before them will pass in review the panoramas of the destruction, and the great body men there are to select a vindictive course of the great flag of the Union—on who is either to be cast in triumph to the capital of the nation, or to suffer it to trail in the dust.

That is the task, we see it is up to us.

This crisis is now, in a strict sense, a one of life and death.

He who is able to meet it with the spirit of self-sacrifice, and the energy of a lion, will be a success, and a leader.

He who is not, will be a failure, and a leaderless.

He who is not, will be a

failure, and a leaderless.
